Counter-season citruses

Published on 31/05/2014 - Published by IMBERT Eric
FruitTrop n°222, Page From 16 to 26
Price : EUR 20.00

2014 European season: prudence the watchword

The 2014 citrus counter-season is not set to be trouble-free. However, the volumes set to be offered on the world market do not appear to be wildly excessive. There will even be a clear shortfall for the lemon. For the other citruses, the combined production of the various Southern Hemisphere supplier countries is registering a high level, but not so far off the 2013 level. However, the market context seems much more difficult, especially on the Old Continent. In the EU-28, competing produce is set for a much bigger presence, through both the leftover Mediterranean citruses and the stone fruit harvests which are taking up most of the shelf space in Southern Europe. In Eastern Europe, the devaluation of the rouble could hinder shipments to the big Russian market.

Informations
- Product(s) : Citrus
- Rubrique / Thématique : Economic analyses
- Country : Europe, Southern hemisphere, World
- Keywords : Export, Import, Production

Articles from same magazine
- 2013-14 litchi season
- Madagascan litchi in 2013-14
- European counter-season small citrus market

Linked articles
- Pomegranate market
- Citruc consumption in the EU-15: quietly declining...
- World citrus market, close to saturation?